SMALL MEDIUM HOUSES

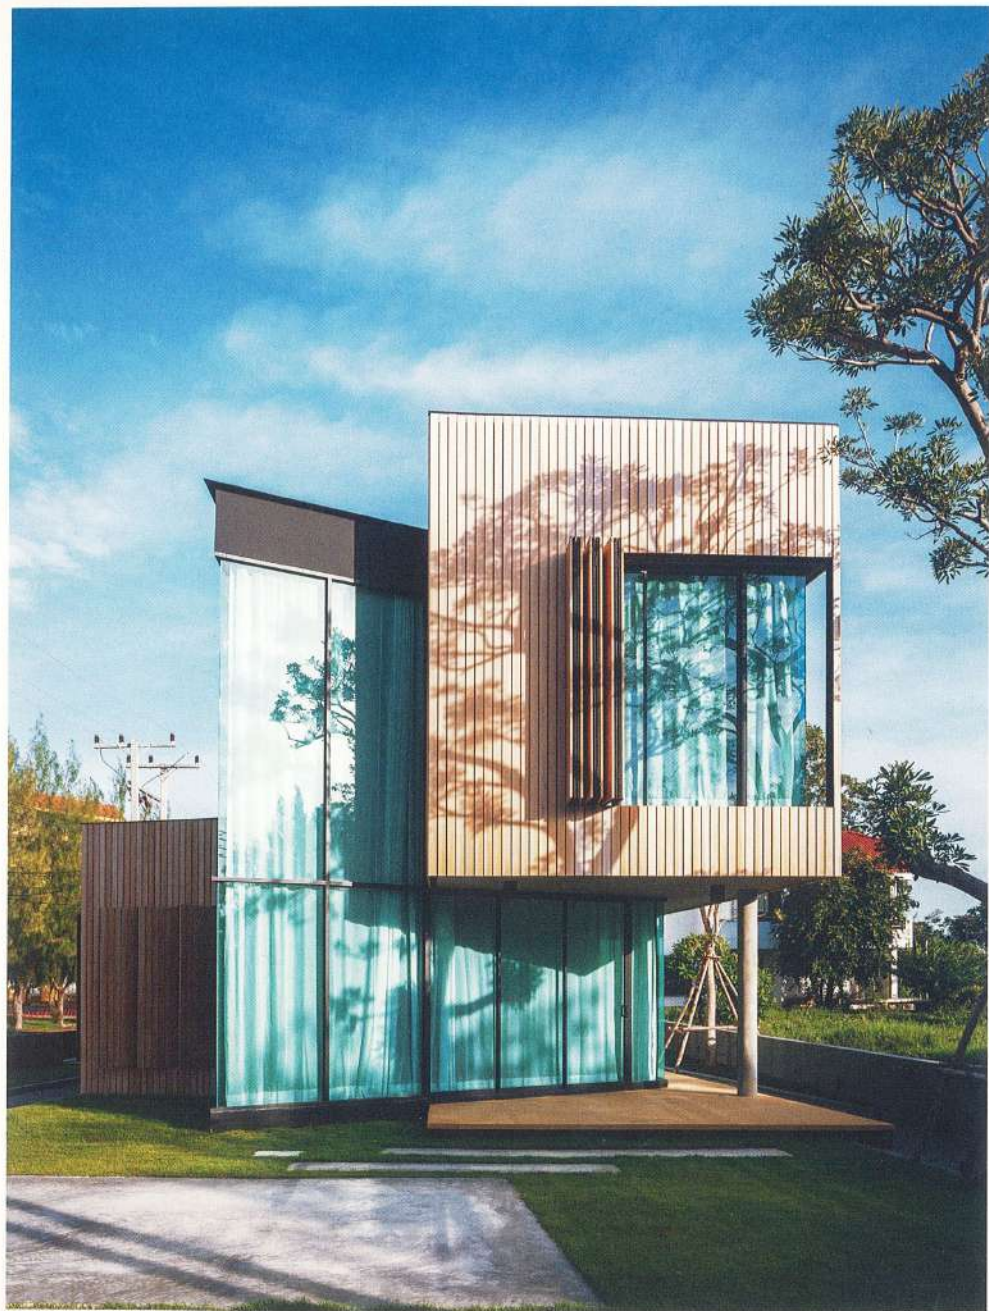

T House is a family vacation house for partying, dining, and resting near Chao Samran beach. The owner has four siblings, each with two kids, and their families total more than ten people when they are gathered together. The architects aimed to create a large shared space, one in which people can occupy their own corner and still talk to each other as if they are in the same area.

Connected Space

Unique Form

The design consists of three bedrooms and a common area which is open to views of the sea and ambient light from the north. The bedrooms also shade the common area. One bedroom on the ground floor connects to the living space and is also more easily accessible for the elders in the family. The walls of the three bedrooms are designed to open fully and transform the house into a single continuous space. Wood is the primary material used both inside and outside the bedrooms. From the exterior, the bedrooms are clearly defined by three wooden masses, and they are divided only by the glass that controls air flow.

The interior responds to the owner's lifestyle and functional requirements. For example, the dining table can adapt to multiple uses, the bedrooms can accommodate multiple people simultaneously, and the stairs even include a rope net for the kids to play.

The limited material set defines a minimalist approach.

The distinctive wood facade is also applied in the interior.
